

THE MUSEUM HOUSES

SMITHFIELD MARKET, FARRINGDON

INTRODUCTION

Smithfield Market is poised to be a pivotal transformation of Central London, breathing new life into the area as a dynamic new cultural quarter for the entire city. And at the heart of this is one of the most ambitious cultural development projects of the decade: the new London Museum. Taking over two of the historic market buildings, this world-class new site will welcome over two million visitors annually from 2026.

The landmark site aims to bring a vibrant cultural hub that showcases the rich history and diversity of London. The new home will showcase more of the Museum's collection than ever before, provide breathtaking space for exhibitions, educational programs, and community engagement, making the city's history accessible to a broader audience within historically significant buildings.

'The world's greatest city deserves the world's greatest museum. This major landmark project will be a jewel in our crown'. Sadiq Khan, Mayor of London

The General Market will open in 2026, housing the museum's permanent galleries. The transformation of this space has seen 10,000 sq m of brickwork painstakingly cleaned, roof reinforced and the excavation of an extensive network of rediscovered vaults.

The 'Museum Houses' surround the General Market, intricate and unusual, these spaces sit like 'houses' around the perimeter of the site creating a series of street-facing units for independent retailers, office space for creatives, and places to eat and drink.

The Museum will play a leadership role in curating Smithfield as a cultural and innovative destination, overseeing big events such as a new annual St Bartholomew's Fair. It is hoped that all neighbours will work with the Museum to help build Smithfield as one of the most significant cultural and heritage destinations in London.
