Urban history as it is practiced today is much more than the local study of towns and cities. It has been characterized by a topographical approach. The topographical aspects of towns, the layout of streets, the siting of buildings, and the configurations of their public spaces, reveal much about the general setting of the town in its geographical environment, are particularly well suited to a survey.