BELFAST 1840 TO 1900

In 1841 Belfast was on the edge of a demographic and topographical revolution. Its population in that year was outranked only by Dublin and Cork and by 1901 it had expanded to represent the largest urban centre in Ireland. In some ways this population explosion was the continuation of a trend under way before 1841. Belfast's population almost tripled between 1802 and 1841 supported by the development of textiles, first cotton and then linen, and a range of industrial processes such as shipbuilding and engineering. The decades prior to 1840 could be seen to represent Belfast's development from a seedling fertilised by industry into a healthy young plant (Map 2, Map 4). W.M. Thackeray, who visited in 1842, commented that Belfast was 'heartily, thriving and prosperous as if it had money in its pockets and roast beef for dinner'.¹ The years after 1840 saw older industrial processes, such as shipbuilding, expand and new manufactures appear in a mature, diversified industrial economy with a consequent transformation in the physical and social topography of Belfast.

* * *

Perhaps the simplest way of delineating how Belfast was transformed in the post-1841 period is to consider population change. The number of people in the city rose from 71,447 (including Ballymacarrett on the Co. Down side of the River Lagan) in 1841 by almost five times to 349,180 in 1901, the fastest rate of growth being between 1861 and 1871. The economic downturn in the 'long depression' from 1873 to 1896 is reflected in slower but still substantial growth in the two decades after 1871, followed by a greatly increased rate of expansion at the end of the century. This growth is all the more remarkable when placed against the downturn in the population of Ireland in the same period. The main source of additional urban population was migration from both the surrounding countryside, and to a much lesser degree from other parts of the British Isles, which constituted the mechanism of growth. The dominance of immigration in late nineteenth-century population growth meant that the world of Belfast was an increasingly socially fragmented one. As Thomas Gaffikin wrote in the 1890s, 'the people of Belfast in the present generation are principally strangers' and this would present its own challenges.² In the late nineteenth century the city retained traces of links with its rural hinterland through its markets selling the produce of the surrounding countryside as well as the animals that roamed the streets. In 1845 the corporation leased 1.5 acres in Ballymacarrett to serve as a manure yard, and there were similar facilities on the other side of the river; in 1858 they were moved from May's Fields to a site closer to the river near the Lagan (i.e. Albert) Bridge.

Population growth of 500% in 60 years caused topographical changes to the nascent industrial town that had been Belfast in 1840. The borough boundary had to be redrawn on two occasions, in 1853 and 1896, to reflect the growing area covered by those living and working in the city (Fig. 1). The immigrants needed a range of new services that changed the way Belfast was organised. Transportation networks were expanded and a range of urban innovations were added to the townscape. By 1847 only 29 of the 178 municipal corporations in England and Wales had applied for the acts of parliament necessary to carry out improvements, by which time Belfast had had three acts passed, in 1845, 1846 and 1847.³ According to the minutes of the meetings of Belfast Corporation, reformed by the Irish Municipal Corporations Act of 1840, the 1845 legislation allowed it to widen existing streets and to open new ones; to install and illuminate public clocks; to secure yards and conveniences to houses; to provide public conveniences and common sewers; to enclose open grounds and dangerous places; and to establish new markets, public slaughter houses and a pound.⁴ The gas works erected in the town in 1823 were taken into municipal ownership in 1873 (although thought had been given to their acquisition much earlier, in 1848), before the corporation had become embroiled in a long legal dispute over financial affairs. Gas output grew fourfold between 1875 and 1905 and as a consequence the gas works, created on land reclaimed from the tidal area of the River Lagan, expanded, covering over 17 acres by 1905. The erection of new buildings within this quarter increased the density of its use and its topographical complexity with significant additions in 1887, 1888 and 1891 as the site was developed. By 1894 electric lighting networks were being installed in Belfast after an enquiry as to the benefits of this form of power had been ordered in 1878. Power was supplied for the first time in January 1895; the following year a site for a new electricity station on the quay at Laganbank Road was acquired.⁵ Telegraph wires were first mentioned in 1863; by 1888 it was telephone poles that were going up across the city.⁶ The corporation minutes even allow one to trace the modernisation of Belfast's fire brigade: in 1860 the old leather hoses were replaced by rubber and as early as 1875 the brigade were issued with breathing apparatus sets to enable them more safely to enter burning buildings.⁷ These developments were matched by new buildings to accommodate the growing fire service. The earliest was located in Victoria Square but it outgrew its premises and moved to Townhall Street. The new headquarters, built in 1871, was one of the first purpose-built fire stations in the British Isles. It was replaced by a building in Chichester Street in 1894. In addition to the central depot, from the 1870s there appear to have been smaller stations across Belfast to meet the needs of a growing town.⁸ Likewise, police stations were erected to provide an infrastructure to maintain law and order.

The most obvious demand of Belfast's growing population was housing. While population grew almost fivefold between 1841 and 1901, the housing stock increased almost seven times in the same period. Over 3,000 streets are recorded in the second half of the nineteenth century compared to about 860 in the town in 1841 (Map 4). Some of these new additions were quite impressive. In 1878 the Belfast Improvement Act granted powers to build Royal Avenue between Donegall Place and York Street, demolishing the old butchers' shambles in Hercules Street. This created a thoroughfare that linked Donegall Place, developed by the marquis of Donegall as a wealthy residential district in the early nineteenth century, with the planned industrial area of York Street (Plate 5). In doing so it finally shifted the social centre of the city away from both High Street and earlier attempts to create a high-status area in Donegall Street, towards the new boulevard leading to the White Linen Hall at the head of Donegall Place (Map 8). The effect was to revolutionise the topography of central Belfast and in the course of the late nineteenth century the principal buildings of the city, including the new city hall and the commercial buildings in Donegall Square, were constructed, or at least started, in this area. This was, above all, a secular development. The vista created by Royal Avenue, with its carefully regulated building heights related to the width of the street, did not include fine church buildings. These were located in the older areas of the city in High Street and Donegall Street, where the new cathedral was to be built at the beginning of the twentieth century on the site of the older parish church. Hence the ecclesiastical centre of Belfast was somewhat marginalised by commercial changes. In addition, along the new Royal Avenue were the agencies of government, most particularly the imposing post office building erected there in 1886. This development also cut short an earlier attempt to form another high-status area on the eastern side of the city. In the 1840s the laying out of Victoria Street connected the older routeways of Cromac Street and Corporation Street to form a long straight boulevard along the shore of the Lagan (Map 6). Land reclamation pushed this part of the town eastwards with the creation of Queen's Square beside Isaac Macartney's 1720s development of Brunswick Square and the markets in May Street. To the west the old Poultry Square was filled in to make Victoria Square, a large public space where before there had been only a dock marking the place where the Blackstaff had entered the Lagan before it was diverted to a new course. In the 1850s and 1860s impressive public buildings were constructed in this area. The new town hall was opened in 1871 on Victoria Street, while the custom house in Queen's Square was constructed in 1858. It was intended to accommodate government offices such as the post office and the inland revenue, resulting in the provision of a number of entrances. Increasingly specialised markets also sprang up in the same district in the 1850s and just to the north the harbour commissioners rebuilt their offices in 1854 in the style of a Renaissance palace, which was extended in 1895.

Outside such grand developments in the centre of the city more modest street and house building gathered pace in Victorian Belfast. The corporation reported that 671 houses had been erected in 1861; in 1878 it was noted that 796 streets had been approved and built over the past 11 years. In 1881 it was reported that 1,826 buildings had been erected on 62 new streets in 1880 and the council approved the construction of a further 2,078 buildings during that year. In 1894 a record 287 houses were approved as part of a single development of eight streets off Donegall Road; finally, as one example, at the meeting of 1 December 1896 Belfast Corporation approved the building of 11 streets, a factory, three extensions to factories, a brick kiln and two schools. One estimate of Belfast's housing stock concluded that around 50,000 houses were built in Belfast in the last twenty years of the century alone.⁹

Whereas in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries Belfast had expanded mainly by making more intensive use of the existing space occupied by the town, in the years after 1840 it grew by building houses and streets on green-field sites outside the old core (Map 5). There were a number of reasons for this shift. The most important was the easy availability of land as the estate of the marquis of Donegall was sold off under the Incumbered Estates Act of 1849. The purchasers of the land were mainly speculators, sometimes builders or property companies, who provided housing for the expanding industrial workforce. These Victorian houses were usually made of red bricks with slate roofs. Much of the clay for the bricks came from Belfast itself and there were a number of brickfields in and around the town (Map 7). These could be of substantial size; the works of H. and J. Martin on the Ormeau Road alone produced scores of thousands of bricks a day. The ready availability of a local building material enabled Belfast's houses to be erected relatively cheaply and this goes some way to explain the reasonable standard of accommodation provided even for working class people in the city. In 1841 some three quarters of Belfast's housing stock was recorded as 1st or 2nd class and by 1901 that had grown to 83%. There were very few back-to-backs; most houses were terraces, either three-bedroom 'kitchen houses' where the front door opened into the kitchen/living room, or the superior and more expensive-to-rent 'parlour houses' where the downstairs bedroom space was sacrificed for a hall. Late in the century larger parlour houses with a third bedroom upstairs were being erected. Such residences, speculatively built and usually rented from landlords from 3s 6d a week for a kitchen house to 5s 0d a week for a large parlour house were homes for the many thousands of industrial workers who formed the majority of Belfast's population.¹⁰ These terraces remained a dominant feature of the city until slum clearance schemes in the later part of the twentieth century removed many of them, such that it has been deemed necessary to declare a surviving street of terraces a conservation area lest this form of housing be lost. This is McMaster Street in east Belfast, not far from the late-Victorian villas on tree-lined Cyprus Avenue, another conservation area, this time exemplifying the townscapes enjoyed by wealthier groups.

The social topography of this spread in house types can be reconstructed for 1860 using the tenement valuation carried out under the direction of Richard Griffith. On the basis of this the town can be divided into distinctive areas (Map 10). There was the low-value housing of the 1830s that had been characteristic of the back streets and courts of industrial Belfast: for example, the area from Great George's Street to Ship Street east of York Street.¹¹ In 1860 these still formed an increasingly dilapidated and insanitary core to the town. In the 1850s this area had gained some notoriety as a result of the publication of W.M. O'Hanlon's Walks among the poor of Belfast. O'Hanlon, the minister of the Independent church on Donegall Street, described a world of densely packed housing, often in courts to maximise the number of houses that could be accommodated. Sanitary arrangements were almost entirely lacking and it was not uncommon for seven people to sleep in one room.¹² The result, noted O'Hanlon, was an underworld of crime and drunkenness in urgent need of moral reform. Elsewhere, a more modern type of terraced house spread to accommodate the industrial workers of the shipyard and engineering works in east Belfast and the textile mills in the west. By the 1860s the beginnings of the development of great swathes of small Victorian terraces that were to become so characteristic of Belfast are clear in these districts. From north of Shankill Road south to Grosvenor Road by 1860 there were already large blocks of such housing and this type of development was to continue to grow westward in monotonous uniformity, epitomised perhaps by the erection of First through to Seventh Streets, when it seems that developers ran out of ideas even for names. Parts of north Belfast and the inner parts of east Belfast were also to be shaped by this type of house, with only a little variation. Builders in late century did attempt to make their properties more attractive to buyers with the use of contrasting, polychrome brickwork around doors and windows.

The dramatic expansion of industrial housing, initially at least, was linked to the spread of factories whose owners sometimes built houses for their workers nearby, giving rise to close communities where factory and community overlapped. The corporation commented in 1869 on mill firms seeking to build large numbers of houses for their workers.¹³ After 1864, however, landlords were made responsible for the cost of rates and repairs to all housing valued at under £8 and many employers lost interest in providing their own housing. It was left to property developers and speculators to build streets of houses to meet the growing demand from immigrant workers for accommodation.

These areas of rapidly constructed working class housing posed particular problems for the infrastructure of the city. Maguire writes of Belfast's 'unique addiction to the old dry closet system',¹⁴ connected to a continuing difficulty in securing sufficient water for the population, until supplies from the Mourne Mountains were obtained in 1901.¹⁵ Animal and human excrement could be found in many places in Victorian Belfast and there are occasional references to such nuisances, especially (but not exclusively) in the old districts of the town built before housing conditions had been regulated by by-laws. Water supply, mainly from local wells, was in constant danger of pollution from such waste. In 1840 the Water Commission was established to provide water for homes and this supply was gradually extended as the town grew, fed from a network of service reservoirs on the edge of Belfast. Most significant was the creation, under an 1893 act, of a reservoir at the Silent Valley, in the Mourne Mountains. In 1845 the council discussed the improvement of sewerage and the diversion of the River Blackstaff was included in this proposal (Map 11). In 1887 an act of parliament sanctioned the building of a main drainage system as part of a late century 'fury of paving and sewerage',¹⁶ and the Belfast Improvement Scheme of 1896 worked on a major extension of the sewerage system. There was a regulatory system to control nuisances in that the council employed sanitary inspectors. These people may not always have been the best choices — The Lancet in 1897 stated that some had been selected 'not always for their technical competence but rather because they held a prominent position in church or chapel and had been able to render eminent service at election times'¹⁷ — but they were certainly busy. In 1861 it was reported that one inspector had 'abated 1,750 nuisances' in 1860, one case being the removal of no fewer than 58 pigs from a row of 20 houses.

One significant topographical feature of the drive for improved standards of public health was the provision of public baths. Some existed before 1846, provided by the Society for the Amelioration of the Working Classes, and O'Hanlon in the 1850s urged an extension of this.¹⁸ After 1873 the corporation became responsible for the provision of such public baths. In 1880 baths were opened at the junction of Shankill Road and Peter's Hill, in what was then a growing suburb. As working class housing expanded so new public bath houses were created. In 1888 Ormeau Avenue acquired a bath house to meet the demand from the Cromac Street area and this was followed by baths in Templemore Avenue in c. 1891, Divis Street in 1896 and Legoniel in 1912.

Sanitary conditions were particularly bad on the east side of the Lagan in Ballymacarrett. This had led the district's landlord, Baron Templemore, a Chichester whose branch of the family had inherited the property from the first marquis of Donegall, to try to re-plot the area. Templemore had elaborate plans drawn up, which had they have been carried out would have transformed the area into a gracious and much more spacious townscape. Unfortunately, although he owned the land, much of it had been let out on long leases and Templemore was unable to finance their repurchase. In the end only a couple of streets were built, principally the long, straight Templemore Avenue, which is rather out of character with other streets in the area.¹⁹ In 1858 leading residents of this district had sought to break away from Belfast, complaining that they were receiving minimal services for the rates that they had to pay.²⁰ This continued and in 1871 the council heard from the medical officer, James Hill, a report identifying very poor conditions there, with many streets under water and sewage for much of the winter. He said that he could reach some buildings only if he went at low tide and it was admitted that the corporation would struggle to find the money to help Ballymacarrett.²¹ The reclamation of the sloblands presumably eased these difficulties, but this process was not itself free from environmental problems and contemporary accounts claimed that the fill was nothing more than ashpit refuse and street scrapings, upon which were erected houses.²² Ballymacarrett in 1870, according to Hill's report, had suffered from a major outbreak of scarlatina and the council had often to deal with serious outbreaks of disease: cholera, although never again present to the same extent as in the dreadful year of 1832, was 'rampant' in 1849 and fever was 'prevalent' in 1866.²³ Two other areas, north and south of the town, had a rather different character. In 1860 remnants of the old pre-industrial pattern of social enclaves with expensive residences on the main streets in the centre of Belfast were still to be found on Chichester Street, Donegall Place and High Street (Plate 3). In the later nineteenth century the gentry, formerly resident in these districts, spread out from the core of the town to the north and south. To the south, settlement spread across the line of the Blackstaff to the semi-rural areas of Malone where only a few of the wealthy had had houses in the early nineteenth century. As a result the Malone Road and its approaches became a fashionable suburb with solid buildings of some pretension such as Upper and Lower Crescent and University Square. Here also part of the new service sector of Belfast, the schools and the university, was located from the 1840s. The corporation minutes noted in 1863 that the Malone suburb was considered to be a preferred residential location of the wealthy and influential.²⁴ In the north of the town the Crumlin and Antrim Roads showed signs of developing early examples of the good quality housing that was to become characteristic of them. There is also evidence of high-value property on the edge of the town associated with small estates. These can be seen particularly in the north-west with some also in the eastern suburbs.²⁵

As the town suburbanised, its middle class population congregated into the areas along the Antrim and Malone Roads. As a result there was a growing demand from this group for intra-urban transportation of a quicker and more reliable nature than that provided by the horse-drawn omnibus along the challenging terrain of dirty streets. Tracked transport was the answer. Inter-urban rail networks had begun just before 1840 when the first railway had been built to Lisburn, that line eventually connecting Belfast and Dublin. Other lines were built for various companies to places such as Bangor, Holywood, Comber and Ballymena. Certainly, commuters from the outskirts of Belfast made up part of the passenger traffic on these services, but perhaps more important to the town itself were the intra-urban tramways (Plate 7). The first was a horse-drawn service from Castle Place to Botanic Gardens in 1872, after a report favourable to the setting up of tramways had been put to the council in 1871.²⁶ By 1885 Belfast Street Tramways Company operated six routes totalling 12 miles (19.3 km) on a frequent service with cheap workmen's tickets priced at 1d being available at peak hours. After another decade the company's routes had increased to 24 miles (38.6 km) and passenger numbers had grown proportionately from 5.8 to 11 million a year. Under the Belfast Corporation Act of 1899 the corporation built several lines itself and the Belfast Corporation (Tramways) Act of 1904 allowed the assets of the rival Belfast Street Tramways Company to be brought under municipal ownership. The corporation had considered a report about steam power being applied to the tramways in 1877,²⁷ but this was not acted upon. Horses remained the motive power until the electrified Belfast City Tramways became operational in 1905, when about 30 million passengers were carried as opposed to one million transported each year by horse trams in the 1880s.²⁸

This suburbanisation process was not confined to the building of new houses linked to the city centre by the spreading transportation network. A wide range of services previously concentrated near the core of the town moved towards its newly-established edges. The burial of the dead, for instance, in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries had been conducted at the parish church on High Street, the New Burying Ground at the Poor House and Friar's Bush on the Stranmillis Road. The cemetery at Friar's Bush had been declared overcrowded in the 1840s but was still being used in 1863 when the council heard that old coffins were regularly being dug up and burnt to make way for new bodies. It was decided at that meeting that a new burial ground should be established and in 1865 land was purchased on the Falls Road, establishing Belfast Cemetery on the lines of garden cemeteries being developed elsewhere. By the beginning of the twentieth century this was extended by the purchase of more land to create Belfast City Cemetery.²⁹

Health provision also moved towards the suburbs. In the early nineteenth century the main hospital was the General Hospital on Frederick Street, which had started as a fever hospital in 1817.³⁰ In 1890 the Mater Infirmorium Hospital operated by the Sisters of Mercy had opened in an expanding suburb off the Crumlin Road and a number of specialist units had been established. These included a lying-in hospital, fever hospital, ophthalmic, women's and children's hospitals.³¹ Suburbanisation is also clear in the experience of the hospital for consumption and diseases of the chest, which was established in Donegall Pass in 1880 but by 1896 had relocated to Knockbreda as Foster Green Hospital. Only just after the end of the century did the large and up-to-date Royal Victoria Hospital on the Falls Road open. For patients who were then called 'insane', there was the Belfast Asylum on the Falls Road dating to 1829. The replacement establishment at Purdysburn, which is outside Belfast, was opened at the end of the period.

Yet another urban problem that was banished to the expanding suburbs was that of poverty, the relief of which was managed mainly through the workhouse system. The eighteenth-century poor house — located on the edge of the town when it was constructed, though it quickly became part of the core of the growing city — continued to operate as a private charity through the nineteenth century. The government-supported workhouse building opened on the Lisburn Road in 1841 (on what is now part of the City Hospital site) under the Irish Poor Law Act of 1838. It reflected a policy that tried to dissuade people from seeking relief except in extremis. Going 'up the Lisburn Road' was a shaming event for working class Belfast folk. Prior to the workhouse, relief had been provided in the house of industry and in the poor house by the Belfast Charitable Society, and charity continued to be an essential part of the relief systems available to those fallen on hard times, for all Thackeray's talk of prosperity and roast beef dinners.³²

Finally, education expanded on the margins of the city. Queen's College (Queen's University Belfast since 1908) opened in December 1849 in a ceremony attended by the mayor and councillors,³³ and had just 90 students in its first intake. It was located on University Road, an area of suburban growth where the city spreading southwards met the older high-status suburb of Malone spreading northwards. The quality of its original iconic building by Charles Lanyon led to the university featuring on Bank of Ireland banknotes in the twentieth century. Within a few years other educational institutions would join the university on the periphery (Map 9). In 1853 the Presbyterian theological college, Assembly's College, was constructed behind Queen's College and the Methodist College, originally intended to train clergy, opened its doors almost opposite Queen's College in 1868. Victoria College, founded in 1859 by Margaret Byers for the education of girls, was located near University Road and the other educational institutions. Similarly the Belfast Royal Academy relocated to a new site in the northern suburbs in c. 1878.

One of the most lasting results of this process of suburbanisation was the creation of an arc of open spaces around the spreading city in the form of public parks. The origins of these parks were diverse. The oldest was the People's Park, located on Queen's Island, which had been created by the dredging of the new channel for Belfast shipping in the 1830s. Ultimately Queen's Island became the site of Harland and Wolff's shipbuilding works, but before the 1880s it was a thriving centre of popular entertainment complete with zoo and its own Crystal Palace in imitation of that in London.³⁴ The recreational facility was relocated to Victoria Park, which opened in 1906. Other parks were acquired by the corporation as circumstances permitted in the late nineteenth century, the oldest of which was Ormeau Park (1871). This had been the country retreat of the Donegall family but after 1844 none of them had lived there and rising debts forced them to dispose of it. In 1882 there was growing pressure to establish a public park for leisure activities in the northern part of the town and this resulted in the purchase of land by the corporation for Alexandra Park, followed by more land in the north for Woodvale Park in 1888.³⁵ Finally in 1889 the distiller Robert Dunville presented land for the making of a park. In the south the largest open area was the Botanic Gardens with its magnificent glass houses. This was owned by a private company that had originated in 1828 as a botanical and horticultural society. By 1895 the company had sold the ground to Belfast Corporation, which opened it to the public without charge. By the end of the nineteenth century the Belfast suburbs were ringed by six publicly owned open spaces. One other open space, the waterworks in the north of the city, might be mentioned, though it was not intended for recreation. By 1900, this was also being used as a park with pleasure boats on the reservoirs and band concerts.³⁶

The suburban expansion of Belfast was influenced by the topography of industrial development in the late nineteenth-century city. The phenomenal growth of the east, around Ballymacarrett, was generated by the location and expansion of shipbuilding at Queen's Island. Belfast was home to the mighty Harland and Wolff shipyard and its second yard, the 'wee yard' of Workman Clark, was actually the fourth largest in the British Isles and could be seen as 'wee' only in the context of Belfast.³⁷ It was not Workman Clark, however, but Harland and Wolff that made Belfast 'shipbuilders to the world', as it has been described by its official historians.³⁸ Belfast had no coal or iron but it did possess areas of flat, easily worked land close to sheltered deep water. Belfast Lough is the deep water and Dargan's Island (as it was originally called) formed the flat land at its edge. This island arose from dredging for the cuts put through the final bend of the River Lagan from the late 1830s onwards to improve access to the port. William Dargan was the engineer in charge, but he lost his placename a few years later when the island was renamed Queen's Island following the visit of Queen Victoria to Belfast in 1849.³⁹ On this island Robert Hickson built a foundry, which also produced ships to help consume its output of iron. In 1854 Edward Harland, from Scarborough in northern England, was engaged to manage this enterprise. Harland wanted to have his own business and tried to set up a yard in Glasgow but instead bought out Hickson in 1858 for £5,000. Gustav Wolff, originally from Hamburg and whose family, then merchants in northern England and in Scotland, were friends of the Harland family, had been Harland's assistant since 1857. He was made a partner in 1861 and was joined by William Pirrie in 1874. Harland was an engineer and had once been an apprentice to Robert Stephenson; Wolff ran the drawing office. Both had important contacts. Wolff, for instance, was nephew to Gustav Schwabe of the Liverpool shipping company John Bibby, for whom 12 of the first 15 Harland and Wolff ships were built. Through Schwabe, Harland met Thomas Ismay whose White Star Line ordered many ships for the North American migrant trade. Harland and Wolff's ships, long and narrow and at first derided as being shaped like coffins, were actually fast and reliable; the Oceanic, the first to be built for White Star in 1870, was particularly innovative as the first modern liner.

The topography of this new complex developed rapidly. The yard expanded over Queen's Island: by 1880 it occupied 40 acres, by comparison to just over 3 acres forty years earlier, and in that year the firm built its own engine works. The overall structure, however, remained a relatively restricted affair. In 1879 there were six slipways, a dry dock and a platers' shed constructed on the reclaimed land that made up Queen's Island, a good part of which was still occupied by the People's Park and the Crystal Palace before it was damaged by fire in 1864 and never repaired. By 1914 the site occupied by the shipyard complex had grown to 135 acres. In 1907 there were eight slipways that could accommodate ships of the size of the Oceanic, then the world's largest ship. The platers' shed had been replaced by two sheds as well as a joiners' shop, cabinetmakers' shop and French polishers' building. A network of roads had been constructed on Queen's Island and the Crystal Palace had been demolished. Opposite the original site there was now a complex of foundries, timber sheds and accommodation needed for the high-quality fitting out of ships by tradesmen such as upholsterers. The site even had its own electricity generating plant. In addition there were chimneys and cranes, including a floating crane that was reckoned to be the largest of its type then in existence (Map 13).⁴⁰

By that time another shipyard, Workman Clark, had been set up on the opposite side of the Lagan and expanded onto the reclaimed land at Queen's Island. Frank Workman was a Belfast man who had worked for Harland and Wolff but wanted to strike out on his own. His partner, George Clark, was a Scot who had also been a Harland and Wolff apprentice. Like Workman, he was linked to the Smith family of Glasgow who ordered the first ship built at the yard for their City Line. Workman Clark occupied initially a rather small site for a shipyard but was able to expand in 1894 by buying the third modern Belfast shipbuilding company, MacIlwaine and McColl, which had gone bankrupt. This acquisition saw Workman Clark increase to 40 acres with ten slips; these enabled them to compete for large orders and the workforce expanded to match, reaching about 5,000 in 1902 as compared to Harland and Wolff's 9,000. It is difficult to reconstruct the topography of the Workman Clark operation in the way that is possible for Harland and Wolff's, but a brochure of 1903 suggests that many of the same elements were common to the two yards. For instance, both had their own power generators.⁴¹ The two big shipyards were not on friendly terms but neither were they antagonistic as they rarely competed, the 'wee yard' specialising more in cargo vessels as opposed to the passenger ships of Harland and Wolff. In 1901, 1909, 1910 and 1913 the 'wee yard' actually out-produced its bigger neighbour in terms of tonnage launched.⁴² The shipyards ended the century as large and successful enterprises. They outstripped production of other yards in Britain and were both building state-of-the-art vessels, especially Harland and Wolff's large liners for the White Star Line.

If shipbuilding underpinned the topographical development of the city to the east, then expansion to the north and west was made possible by the linen industry that located itself in these areas (Plate 4). Linen was perhaps more important in that it developed earlier than the major shipyards and Belfast became 'linenopolis', whereas it was only one of a number of significant shipbuilding centres in the British Isles. Without the linen trade the city might have remained a market centre and port, since before the last quarter of the nineteenth century linen was its only major industry. The number of flax spindles in Belfast went up from less than 500,000 in 1862 to 724,000 in 1868 and the number of powerlooms from under 3,000 to nearly 9,000.⁴³ Factories developed in particular parts of Belfast, building on earlier traditions of industrial activity. Relatively few linen businesses were established in the east of the city where shipbuilding dominated. In the west linen factories developed, for instance, along Falls Road and Shankill Road (Fig. 2). There the earlier cotton factories had been established to take advantage of water power but the same pattern of industrial location continued despite the introduction of steam power, encouraged by migrant communities who established themselves in these areas looking for employment in the mills. While manufacturing may have been located in traditional areas, other branches of the trade found homes elsewhere. Linen warehouses tended to be established in commercial areas of the city, some of which were only then being developed. For instance, Bedford Street and Dublin Road, which were laid out in the 1850s, were not intended as residential areas but were lined with three- and four-storey warehouses devoted to the storing and selling of linen and were built as much to impress as to be functional (Map 12).

The story of linen in Belfast is not one of unbroken success; the industry had troubled times towards the end of the century with a number of firms going bankrupt and there were also occupational health problems. Lung diseases, including tuberculosis, were particularly prevalent in the linen industry with its hot and damp conditions, and textile fibres — a dust known as 'pouce' — in the atmosphere. Linen established the city's industrial presence, upon which later industries were able to capitalise, and its demands helped to stimulate other sectors such as foundries, machine making, engineering and chemicals. It supplied jobs for thousands of women: in the Edwardian era women comprised 70% of the industry's workforce, a major contribution to the almost 40% of the city's total workforce that was female.⁴⁴ This helped to make working class families more prosperous than they might otherwise have been and also gave Belfast and its women much of their distinctive character.⁴⁵ Belfast became the largest linen-producing centre in the world and remained so until the First World War.

Linen and shipbuilding may have had the most dramatic effect on the topography of Belfast by expanding industrial housing in their wake, but they were far from being the only industrial activities. Nineteenth-century trade, however, was not the same as trade in today's globalised world in that there was still found then, especially in the earlier decades of the century, what can be called localism — the production of goods for the local market. One did not transport fresh bread over distances; any city like Belfast had many bakeries, local family businesses in the main, supplied with their flour by local millers. Their localism does not mean that they were small-scale, for there was a large urban population to feed. One of the most successful bakers of Victorian Belfast, Bernard Hughes, presided over factories equipped with the most modern technology and integrated his baking operations with flour mills that he also established in the city. Hughes's wealth allowed him to become an important philanthropist in Victorian Belfast.⁴⁶ Other local products consumed within the city included beer and other food and drink products, and some at least of the produce of soap and tallow makers, starchmakers, tanners and paper makers. Most Belfast people probably used the products of the city's brush makers; the iron, brick and other building materials were for the local market. These were not the industries that made Belfast an industrial city, though they would have provided thousands of jobs, nor did they draw in migrants. Rather they fed upon the growing city. As new streets were built, bakers would open to sell fresh bread; as more houses were demanded, more brickyards were established.

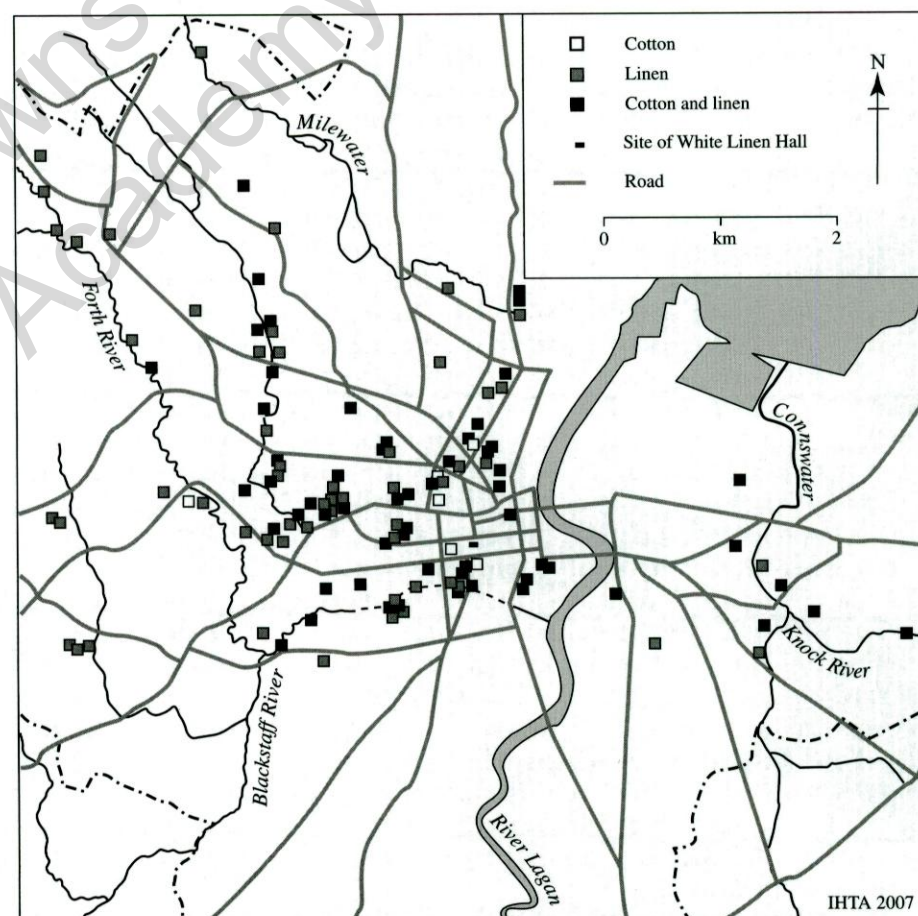

Fig. 2 Cotton and linen manufactories, c. 1900

It was another sector of manufacturing that came to dominate Belfast industry: the production of goods for export onto a national or an international market, sometimes through further processing of local products. In addition to ships and linen, some of the output from machine manufactories, block and pump manufactories, nautical instrument manufactories, rope works, bleachers, glass manufactories, industrial chemists and bobbin and spindle manufactories were exported. There were also tobacco factories, distilleries and mineral water companies. These last included Cantrell and Cochrane and Ross's, which produced soda and tonic waters that would have comforted many a colonialist in his or her tropical outpost when mixed with their paired alcoholic products of whiskey (or whisky) and gin respectively.

Underpinning this industrial development was another aspect of economic activity that had a dramatic topographical impact. The banking network expanded in the late nineteenth century to fund the workings of the economy. Of considerable opulence, the banks were intended to convince customers of the financial as well as the material solidity of the enterprise. Perhaps the best example of this is the head office of the Ulster Banking Company in the commercial district of Waring Street. Completed in 1860 the building was an imposing feature in the townscape with its carved figures of Britannia supported by justice and commerce. The National Bank in High Street, built in 1894–7 with five storeys, dwarfed all the surrounding buildings. As with other areas of Belfast life in the nineteenth century, banks spread with the growing conurbation. By the 1890s branches of all the main banks were established in the socially diverse areas of Shankill Road, York Street and Shaftsbury Square.

All of this trade increased the demand for shipping and the associated port facilities for the expanding city (Plate 1). While the number of ships entering the port of Belfast rose only some 30% between 1860 and 1914, the increased capacity of those ships meant that the tonnage of shipping passing through the port grew from some 800,000 tons in 1860 to over 3 million tons in 1913. This increase in the size and number of ships forced major changes in the organisation and layout of docks. In 1847 the Belfast Harbour Act had reconstituted the Belfast harbour commissioners as the port authority. Within a year of its appointment the Victoria Channel, begun under the harbour commissioners, was completed. The dredging of this long, deep channel made possible the transformation of Belfast from a tidal port into a modern trading centre with a well-defined artery along which trade could flow (Map 1). The channel in the river was deepened in 1861 but by 1886 this was insufficient and dredging was begun to provide a channel 5 m deep into Belfast Lough as far as Cultra. A new channel, the Musgrave Channel closer to the south shore of the Lagan, was started in 1899 and completed four years later. The old town docks at the end of High Street and the quays on the Lagan on either side were finally filled in, as being too limited for the new ships, and new docks were provided for shipping. In 1851 Clarendon Dock was created, in 1872 Spencer Dock and Dufferin Dock were built, and in the following year Albert Quay was extended and rebuilt. In 1876 York Dock was constructed, followed in the late 1880s by Alexandra Graving Dock on the Antrim side of the Lagan to encourage shipbuilding there. Thompson Graving Dock, then the largest dry dock in the world, was built on the Co. Down side of the river in 1911. At the same time land was in the process of being reclaimed along the north side of Belfast Lough, allowing for future expansion of shipbuilding and other activities in this area. By 1914 Belfast was the largest port in Ireland with a docks complex to match the scale of that trade (Plate 9).

As the population of Belfast grew and spread, so too did the need for spiritual services. From the 1870s church buildings dispersed in all directions as the city extended (Fig. 3). The inhabitants of Belfast individually embraced, often with fierce loyalty and unbending attitudes, one of a number of Christian traditions, often too simplistically categorised as Catholic and Protestant. Protestantism was very diverse and Victorian Belfast had to provide both a large number and a considerable variety of churches, chapels and halls for this sector of the population. Indeed, Thackeray thought that 'the stranger cannot fail to be struck (and haply a little frightened) by the great number of meeting houses that decorate the town, and give evidence of great sermonising on Sundays'.⁴⁷ The Anglicans (Church of Ireland) and Presbyterians dominated the Protestant population numerically, with the latter broken into a number of different groups, as was also the case with the Wesleyan-Methodist churches. There were also Covenanters, Congregationalists, Baptists, Unitarians, Moravians, a variety of Iron and Mission Halls, the Evangelical Union, the Secession Church, some small independent sects, Quakers, the Salvation Army and a synagogue. In all there were over 200 non-Catholic places of worship, almost all of them Protestant. By contrast there were only 15 Roman Catholic churches by 1901, plus some properties belonging to religious orders such as St Mary's Dominican Convent on Falls Road, which opened in 1870. This small number of church buildings partly reflects the coherence of Catholicism, there being no need to provide for such a plethora of small sects as on the Protestant side, but it also had other causes, including the poverty of the adherents that made it difficult for buildings to be afforded. One estimate, from 1863, was that 'only one-third of Belfast Catholics attended Sunday mass ... if for no other reason than lack of a church to go to'.⁴⁸ Matters were eased somewhat by the erection of more Catholic churches later in the century, including St Peter's Pro-Cathedral (Cathedral since 1986) off Falls Road in 1866, while St Patrick's Church on Donegall Street, dating from 1815, was rebuilt as a much larger structure in 1875-7. It is a reflection of the growing wealth of Belfast over the late nineteenth century that the churches became much grander buildings than they had ever been before. The older classical buildings favoured by the Presbyterians were replaced by High Victorian gothic churches such as those at Elmwood (1860-62) and Fitzroy Avenue (1872). Methodists, too, indulged in new architectural fashions, leaving behind classical buildings such as that in Donegall Square (1850) and constructing more ornate structures such as that on University Road.

The influence of churches was much greater than their topographical presence suggests. Churches were important centres of sociability and the growth in the number of church halls in Victorian Belfast points to this fact. Such places to gather, together with the more secular worlds of the Freemasons and the music halls, made it possible for immigrants to acquire new friends and contacts, and to adjust to urban life amid a burgeoning population. In addition churches provided basic education through Sunday schools. After the establishment of the national system of education in 1832 most educational provision in Belfast was organised along sectarian lines, at both primary and secondary level. The national schools, the actual church schools and the relatively few facilities for older pupils were overcrowded and at the turn of the century many were in poor condition. Absenteeism was high, not least because many children worked, especially in the mills, although officially such youngsters were regarded as 'half-timers' who should have spent half the day or, after 1874, alternate days at school.

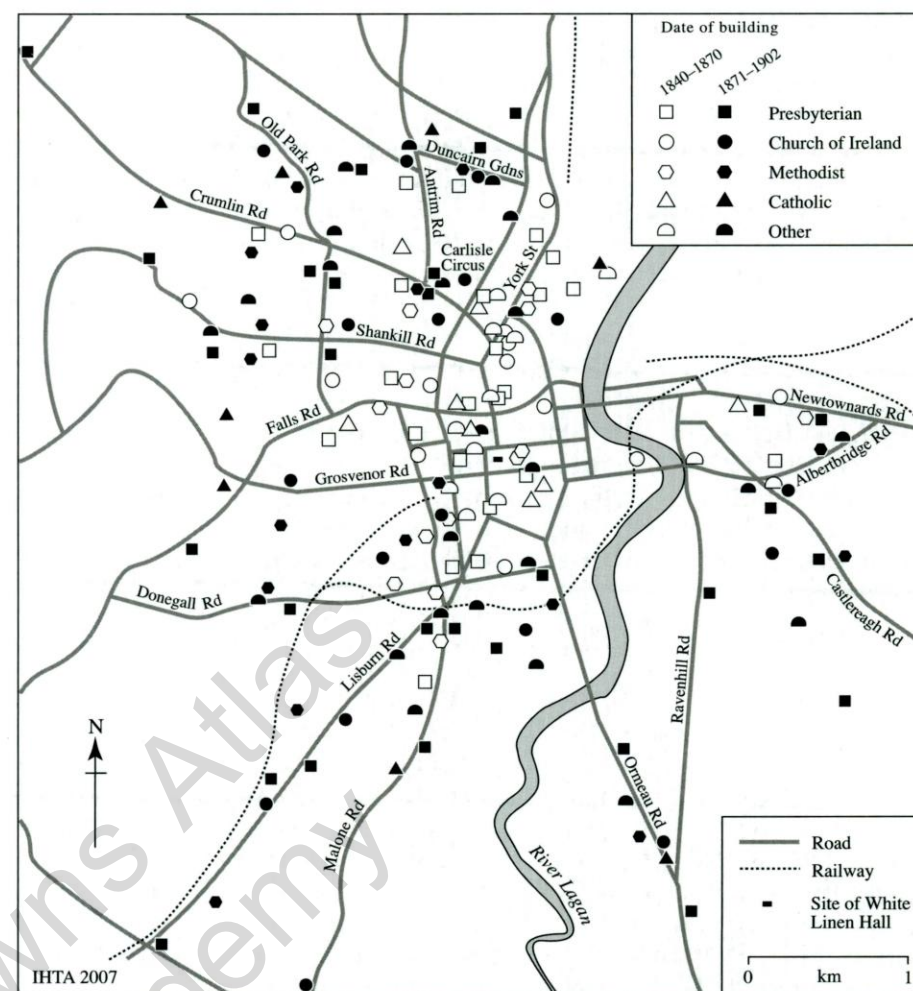

Fig. 3 Belfast churches, 1840-1902

Local denominational balances profoundly affected the geography of church building across the entire city. The 1860 valuation does not allow Belfast to be broken up into Protestant and Catholic areas, although the broad pattern of such districts during this period is well known. On the other hand the enumerators' books from the 1901 census do permit a quantitative analysis of this type. Work has been carried out by Anthony Hepburn and Brenda Collins and one of their maps has been redrawn as Fig. 4.⁴⁹ This shows the distribution of Catholics and Protestants in 34 divisions as used in the census enumeration manuscripts in 1901. The areas that stand out as being strongly Catholic are the Falls Road sector, stretching linearly from long-established areas of high Catholic density in Smithfield and the Pound; also the Ardoyne to the north. These enclaves dictated the focal points of Catholic religious life in Belfast. The new pro-cathedral of St Peter's, funded by local Catholic businessmen, was located in the core of one such Catholic neighbourhood. Again religious communities, such as the Dominican convent founded in 1870 on Falls Road, the 1879 Mercy convent in Sussex Place and the Redemptorist community founded at Clonard in 1896, were all situated in confessionally cohesive areas. Other parts of the city with relatively high Catholic densities that reflected the socio-economic differentiation between Catholics and Protestants, with the mass of the former being poorer, were those near the docks where there was casual work and a high number of lodging houses, and some of the middle class areas where there were many Catholic maids. The now much expanded St Brigid's Catholic Church in Derryvolgie Avenue, along the high-status Malone Road, used to be attended largely by Catholic maids.⁵⁰ Hepburn and Collins go on to confirm the wealth differentiation between the two groups, showing that 32% of Catholics occupied small terraces with a poor law (or rateable) annual valuation of under £5 in 1901 compared to 13% of other denominations (almost exclusively Protestants), whilst at the other end of the scale only 6% of Catholics had housing worth above £12 compared to 16% of Protestants.

The topography of religious division within Belfast is of considerable importance for the evolution of the city in the late nineteenth century since it sometimes led to violence. This often occurred along fracture lines where two religiously cohesive areas met. Thus the interface between Protestant Sandy Row and Catholic Durham Street meant that the Pound, as it became known, was a frequent location for riots in Victorian Belfast. Riots occurred in the Sandy Row - Pound area in 1843, 1852, 1857, 1864 and 1872. While this continued to be a cockpit of violence, often prompted by sectarian marches intended to mark out local territory, the expansion of the city also saw a growth in the number of sites of rioting. In the 1880s and 1890s Carrick Hill, Dover Street, Falls Road and Shankill Road were all flashpoints of violence, often occasioned by party processions.⁵¹ The causes of violence were complex but certainly involved increased migration, fear of, or actual, competition for employment and other social goods as well as competing national aspirations. Further, the opportunity for unrest grew as the city did, massive immigration throwing the different groups into closer contact. In our period the first major unrest was in the 1840s, when Catholics were buoyed up by the enthusiasm for Daniel O'Connell's repeal of the union and Ireland was in economic crisis because of famine.⁵² There was further unrest in 1852 and 1857 when police officers were awarded an extra week's pay 'in consideration of the very arduous duty imposed on them during the disturbed state of the town at and subsequent to the 12th July last' (this was, and still is, the date of the Orange marches celebrating the battle of the Boyne in 1690). The following year there was another bonus for the police coping with disturbances in May and extra work caused by 'the usual precautionary measures taken to preserve the peace at the 12th July'. In 1864 the police committee sought funding for an extra 100 officers to reinforce the enrolment of 161 and an additional three stations, each with 50 cells to enable them to cope with riots for, 'the committee are well aware of the excitable character of our operative and labouring classes, and their difference in both political and religious views. If the slightest provocation be given on either side, a riot is sure to ensue'.⁵³ The local Belfast police were replaced by the Irish Constabulary in 1865 (the 'Royal' was not granted until 1867) but riots continued notwithstanding, including that stimulated by the Protestant 'march to Hannahstown' in 1872, which saw the worst violence. The council was not pleased to report that in 1873 the town's riots had come to the attention of parliament in London.⁵⁴ In 1886 violence occurred over the home rule issue; in the late 1890s the march to Hannahstown was revived and in 1901 the first Catholic march for 50 years was held.

While the physical expansion of Belfast in the late nineteenth century resulted in considerable topographical alteration in the city, shifts in perception were equally radical. Those changing perceptions were reflected in the topography of urban government. In the early nineteenth century the town had been governed from the late seventeenth-century market house on High Street but this fell out of favour. It was felt to be too small and not in a suitable location in view of the development of Donegall Place and the new Linen Hall in the early nineteenth century. In 1866 the corporation set aside £15,000 for the building of a new town hall on a site on Victoria Street then occupied by George's Market, which itself had to be re-located. The new venture was planned to include a police office and petty sessions courts and it is still a court building. With the laying out of the boulevard along Royal Avenue in the 1880s, this location in turn lost status as the site of the corporation's deliberations. The corporation decided that a new and more impressive building in a more fashionable quarter was necessary and this led to the opening of City Hall in 1906. The journey towards that event can be traced back to a decision made by the corporation in November 1889 to use the site of the White Linen Hall for a replacement chamber only 18 years after the town hall had opened, but significantly only a year after Belfast's official accession of city status in 1888. The site of the old Linen Hall had many attractions, not least because it closed the vista along Royal Avenue and hence provided an impressive vantage point for the new building (Plate 6). The competition to select the architect for City Hall was announced in July 1896.⁵⁵ Ten years later the building, designed in a Baroque revival style by Alfred Brumwell Thomas, was completed.⁵⁶ The growing dominance of the corporation in the Victorian period symbolised by the erection of Belfast City Hall was not unusual, and this expression of municipal pride can be paralleled in many contemporary British cities.⁵⁷

The corporation was also active in other building projects. In the early nineteenth century public meeting spaces had been funded by private groups, the most notable examples being the Linen Hall Library and the old museum in College Square, founded in 1830. By the late nineteenth century that function was passing to the corporation. In 1884 the free library, incorporating a small museum, was opened in the northern part of Royal Avenue (now Belfast Central Library) and by 1898 branch libraries were being considered. In 1889–90 the Belfast Museum and Art Gallery was established on the Botanic Gardens site. Finally, in 1908 the corporation acquired the Ulster Hall, built in 1862 as a music hall on Bedford Street, to provide a civic venue for musical entertainment. Nor was the city to be found wanting in public commemoration. The first public statue was erected in front of 'Inst' (the Royal Belfast Academical Institution) in 1855 commemorating Frederick, earl of Belfast and son of the marquis of Donegall. Although the statue was replaced in 1876 by one of the Presbyterian preacher Henry Cooke, it set a fashion for the creation of public sculpture in the townscape. In 1869 the Albert Clock was completed at the end of High Street, close to the newly emerging high-status area of Victoria Street and Queen's Square with their town hall and custom house, as a memorial to the late prince consort. Statuary became increasingly common in Belfast. In the early twentieth century the grounds of the newly built City Hall became the location not only for a statue of Queen Victoria and statues of prominent lord mayors but also for memorials to those lost in the sinking of Belfast's icon, the Titanic, and those killed in the First World War.

In parallel expressions of both modernisation and pride, the harbour commissioners left the old Ballast Board for new offices on the site of William Ritchie's shipyard, while the revenue authorities moved to the magnificent custom house in 1857 (Plate 2).⁵⁸ Similar sentiments might be attached to the Church of Ireland's replacement of the old parish church of St Anne in 1898 to make way for the new cathedral of the same name. The Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette opined that 'we are very proud of ourselves ... a cathedral ... will be in keeping with our commercial greatness, and being so will of necessity be the finest church of its class in Ireland, even as Belfast is by far the first and foremost of Irish cities'.⁵⁹ Donegall Place, which had been developed as a residential zone around the White Linen Hall in the early nineteenth century, now became the commercial area of the city. By 1892 it was described as the Bond Street of Belfast, it being 'distinguished by some of the most select and fashionable shops and merchantile emporia in the city'.⁶⁰ Some of these buildings were dramatic in appearance, with department stores such as Robbs, Anderson and MacAuley's, and Robinson and Cleaver's opening in late century. Messrs Robinson and Cleaver applied for permission to build on the corner of Donegall Place and Donegall Square North in 1886 a six-storey building of such size and potential prominence that it merited notable mention in the corporation minutes.⁶¹ Although no longer a department store, the overblown Italianate building still graces its significant site and retains the carvings around the outside of some of the shop's most significant customers, including Queen Victoria and the maharajah of Cooch Behar. Donegall Square as a whole quickly became the favoured site for commerce with the result that solid Victorian buildings sprang up on all sides, normally devoted to financial rather than to retail business, as testimony to the growing wealth and civic pride of Belfast. Early office blocks, such as the Ocean Accident Insurance Buildings (1900) and the Scottish Provident Institution (1899–1902), both on Donegall Square, replaced residential buildings and dwarfed those remaining around them with their massive height, confidently breaking the scale and style of late Georgian Belfast.

It would be satisfying to characterise late nineteenth-century Belfast as exemplifying the rise of a new style of industrial town with its own distinctive economic, social and religious topography. This economic view of developments contrasts with the grander vision in 1900 of the new cathedral rising to match the pride of the Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette, large stores, the Grand Opera House with its gilt elephants, and the magnificent City Hall then under construction. Unfortunately, symbolised by the sinking of the Titanic in 1912, but actually brought about by economic and political problems as well as the horrors of the Great War, things began to go badly wrong. Belfast went 'from construction to destruction; from urban order to urban disorder, from expansion to contraction, from community to separation, from pleasure to pain'.⁶² Difficult economic conditions in the 1930s combined with sectarian violence to create particularly intractable political and social problems that culminated in the strife of the late twentieth century. The rebuilding after terrorist bombs and what had come to be perceived as Victorian slum housing have changed the topography of the city from a decaying industrial conurbation to a modern metropolis in which traces of the industrial past are increasingly difficult to find (Map 3, Plate 8). A series of positive political developments have transformed Belfast into the lively tourist and service centre with a promising future that few would have thought possible during the Troubles.

Topographical Information

This fascicle, Belfast, part II, contains topographical information after 1840; the corresponding earlier material appears in Belfast, part I, to 1840. Entries that have a history before 1840 begin with an arrow symbol and the first referenced date is included in square brackets.

The information relates not to any single administrative division or the sheet lines of any particular map, but to the main built-up area of Belfast for the period 1840 to 1900.

All grid references used are derived from the Irish National Grid. This grid appears at 100 m intervals on Map 3. In the Topographical Information grid references are included where possible for features not named on either Map 2, Map 3 or Map 4; they are given in eight figures (the last four figures respectively of the eastings and northings shown on Map 3) and indicate the approximate centre of the feature in question.

The entries under each heading, except for Streets, are arranged in chronological order by category: for example, all mills are shown before all brickfields, because the oldest mill pre-dates the oldest brickfield. Features and categories that existed before 1840 are listed first and they are ordered as in Belfast, part I, to 1840. Sites are classified according to their primary function.

The topographical information has been compiled using a selection of sources for the period and sites are identified if they are known from these particular records. In source-citations, a pair of years joined by a dash includes all intervening years for which that source is available: thus 1858–1901 (OS) means all Ordnance Survey maps from 1858 to 1901 inclusive. Changes after 1901 are not recorded unless a feature is still evident on the 2005 Ordnance Survey map.

Street names are listed in alphabetical order. The first entry for each street gives its present-day name according to the most authoritative source, followed by its first identifiable appearance, named or unnamed, in a map or other record and the various names subsequently applied to it in chronological order of occurrence. For names remaining unchanged on successive Ordnance Survey maps, only the first occurrence of the Ordnance Survey spelling is cited.

The section on residence is not intended to embrace more than a small fraction of the city's dwelling houses. The main criteria for inclusion are (1) contribution to the townscape, past or present; (2) significance in defining critical stages in the history of urban or suburban housing; (3) abundance of documentation, especially for houses representative of a large class of dwellings. Biographical associations are not in themselves a ground for inclusion.

Abbreviated source-references are explained in the bibliography on pages 89–90 or in the general list on page ii.

NOTE ON MAP 2

Map 2, Belfast in c. 1830, is derived from the Ordnance Survey 1:2376 manuscript plan of Belfast (1828–33) together with the Ordnance Survey 1:10,560 manuscript fair plan of Co. Antrim (1828–33) and the 1:10,560 published first edition maps of Co. Antrim (1833) and Co. Down (1834). Information was supplemented by the manuscript first valuation field books for Belfast (1837) and other sources. The reconstruction has been adjusted to the planimetry of the published Ordnance Survey 1:1056 town plan (1858). Solid lines depict features still extant in 1858, while dotted lines indicate that, since the feature had by then disappeared, its exact position cannot be established. Where information on plot boundaries was not available the internal layout is not represented, while unfinished dotted lines mean that property divisions were only partly determinable, as along High Street and Waring Street.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The names of the editorial team of the Irish Historic Towns Atlas appear on the front cover, scant recognition of the tremendous contribution each made in bringing to fruition this huge project, dealing with the town, then city of Belfast over just a sixty-year span. Others of what seemed like a small battalion of people working on the project receive their acknowledgement below. There were two funded Research Assistants, both doctoral candidates in geography at Queen's University Belfast, initially Peter Finlay and then, for a longer period, Edwin Aiken. Both performed heroic labours in the collection of the material for the enormous topographical information sections from primary sources and Edwin then went on to help edit some of the material.

A number of the maps were prepared with customary diligence by Maura Pringle, Senior Cartographer at the School of Geography, Archaeology and Palaeoecology at Queen's University Belfast, to whom many thanks. The team on the top floor of the Royal Irish Academy up those very steep stone steps was boosted by the labours of Research Assistants, Angela Byrne and Jennifer Moore. Mary Davies, the project's first Cartographic Editor, read a draft of the topographical information.

Staff at the various repositories were courteous and helpful. Thus thanks go to the Belfast Central Library; the British Library; the Linen Hall Library, Belfast, particularly John Killen; the National Library of Ireland; Paul Ferguson and Trinity College Map Library; and the Ulster Museum, especially Michelle Ashmore and Pat McClean. The collections of Queen's University Map Library, which is run by Maura Pringle in intervals between drawing maps, and the Royal Irish Academy Library were significant resources for the project and the support of the staff of both repositories is much appreciated. Particular acknowledgement is given to the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland as it holds the bulk of material interrogated in this fascicle and Valerie Adams was most helpful in providing access.

Financial aid for this publication came from Belfast City Council, whose modern seal, with the same cast of beasts, bells and ships as the seal of the seventeenth-century town, is placed alongside that of the Royal Irish Academy on the back cover. Thanks are due to the Council's Heritage Officer, Robert Heslip, and to his predecessor, Briony Crozier.
