Manager Commentary

US markets were volatile again in November sending shock waves through the rest of the financial world. Investor sentiment worsened in December, when there was very little interest in local assets and Russian markets came under serious pressure.

European and US economic macro data have been disappointing in the past 1-2 months and the slowdown in China is now more pronounced than a few months ago. The Fed has kept its plans for further rate increases despite numerous global political risks and trade tensions.

We think that markets could move even lower in the medium term, but some relief is possible in the year-end period and on the eve of the new reporting season. We sold shares of Juniper Networks Inc. in November.
