Manager Commentary

Russian shares continued to retreat in August, when developed markets joined most emerging markets on the downward path. The reason was weak economic data from China and sudden fall of the yuan against the dollar, which caused a dive on the Chinese stock market, triggering a sell-off in Europe and America. But decline of the Russian market was predictable even without the external factors.

We expect further volatility in equity and bond markets, but see limited downside in commodity markets. Bottoming out of oil prices may support Russian equities in the medium term. We also view the current weakness of global markets as temporary.

We sold GDRs of Norilsk Nickel in August.
