Manager Commentary

Russian equities traded in a range through October after growth in September. Weakness was apparent by the start of November, which we expect to be a dismal month on the back of weaker oil and a stronger dollar. However, we are optimistic that losses will be modest and we keep our positive medium-term view on Russian equities, expecting major gains next year on stronger EM growth, European recovery, continued outflows from bonds to riskier assets, local macro and policy drivers as well as Russian financial infrastructure improvements.

We reduced equity holdings in October and the start of November and increased our cash position for the short-term. Lukoil shares were sold and shares of Dixy were bought into the portfolio.
