Manager Commentary

Ruble depreciation gave contradictory trends on the MICEX (trading in rubles) and RTS (trading in dollars) in October. Share prices in rubles stagnated in the first 20 days of the month, but then rose in the last third of October, while prices in foreign currency declined steadily through the month. Demand shifted to export-oriented companies with ruble costs and revenues in foreign currency. Main risks (potential downgrade of Russia's credit rating, risks of further escalation in Ukraine, further decline in oil prices) remained unchanged. So the Manager refrained from buying and waited for sentiment to improve.

We expect the FX rate to stabilize soon, at which time investors may shift their focus to domestic stories, but overall volatility is likely to continue. We made no trades in October.
