THEATRE REVIEW

BICYCLE BOY

Oxford Playhouse Plays Out is a fantastic venture bringing audiences out of the theatre and over to surprising locations across Oxford. Around this time last year they were honouring Roger Bannister's 4 minute mile at the Iffley Road running track, and this spring they celebrate the world's best invention - the brilliant bicycle!

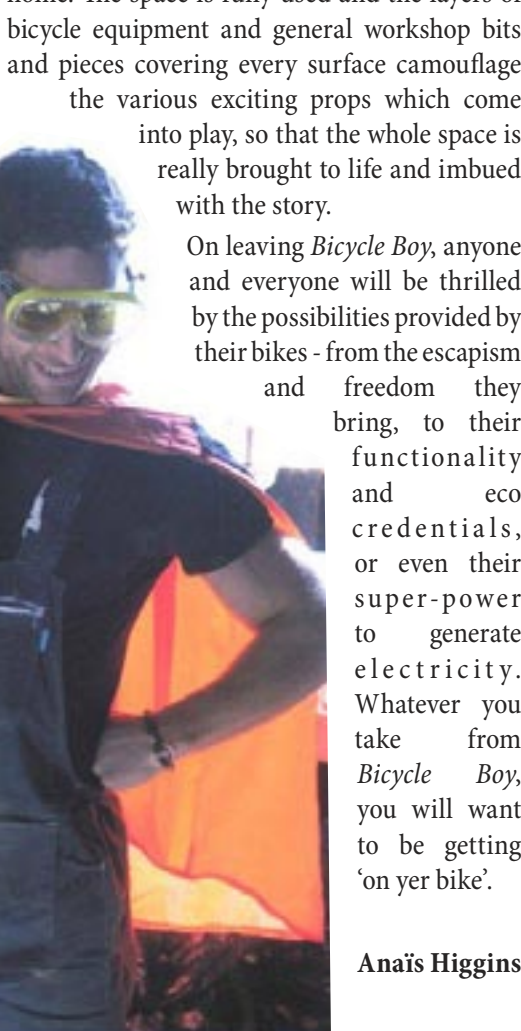

Bicycle Boy sees Sam packing up and moving out of his family-run bicycle workshop business - Lanford & Sons. His brother, Mike, has come to help him out, but they get side-tracked in reminiscing about their favourite childhood bikes and games - and seeking a very special present.

It's really hard to strike a balance between being assertive enough to direct children's attention toward surprising elements or conclusions, but also sharing the same wide-eyed innocence with them. Leon Scott's characterisation is perhaps almost a bit too profound to be believably naive. However, I would put this mostly down to it having been the opening night of an interactive show, and the unpredictability of performing to young children. That he performed energetically and made you care for his character and his backstory was essentially a good thing.

The Osney Mill Marina Garage provides a perfect location, and the informal setting and cluttered design make you feel instantly at home. The space is fully used and the layers of bicycle equipment and general workshop bits and pieces covering every surface camouflage the various exciting props which come into play, so that the whole space is really brought to life and imbued with the story.

On leaving Bicycle Boy, anyone and everyone will be thrilled by the possibilities provided by their bikes - from the escapism and freedom they bring to their functionality and eco credentials, or even their super-power to generate electricity. Whatever you take from Bicycle Boy, you will want to be getting 'on yer bike'.
