WOOD Festival: An eco-festival in Brazier's Park, Fri 20th - Sun 22nd May '11

Back in Oxford, I'm relieved to find that the End of Days has not come and swept away my home and colleagues. Inside Wood Festival it seemed quite possible we were in a charmed bubble that might be spared Judgement Day, and we could all come out once the danger had passed, to build a happier, greener world.

WOOD is a funny kind of music festival, in that if you ask the festival-goers who they've come to hear, no-one seems to know who's playing. In fact one person told me they didn't really like folk. So why is it so popular?

To people with children it seems to be the genial and safe atmosphere, combined with a size of venue which makes losing people difficult. Children of all ages can be let loose to enjoy themselves. One family said they came for the campfire - certainly an unusual feature in a festival. And with fire stewards presiding as long as there are flames it's also quite a safe one for children, however hellbent they are on toasting marshmallows.

There are also workshops, stalls, and a heck of a lot of recycling points. It could all end up being too good to be true, but nothing is forced on anyone. The festival's green credentials are becoming widely recognised, helping it win its host of awards, including:

"Gold award from A Greener Festival, the Industry Green 2* award from Julie's Bicycle and is shortlisted for MusicWeek's

Green Business award. It even won 'Best Festival' from The Oldie Magazine!" - woodfestival.co.uk

The music I did hear was lovely. The strains of Jali Fily Cissokho's kora drifted up the slope, perfect sunbathing music. I enjoyed Holton's Opulent Oog, on Sunday at teatime, again across a sunny field. I did worry a little that it must be frustrating for the performers, being treated as background music by so many people, but I hope they appreciated being appreciated from afar.

The Samba Procession was determined to be heard, and wound round the stalls and tents incorporating everyone in its path. Some of the families had already been to workshops making instruments to rattle, hit or otherwise join in with, and a practice session where Sol Samba demonstrated the different rhythms that form part of an intricate musical patchwork: "I like to PAR-ty", "mummydaddymummydaddy mummydaddy" and so on. Dressed largely in pink, alerting you to its presence all over the site, the procession is, in all senses, unmissable.

Part of the fun of holding a festival in May is that you can't predict the weather. On the whole we were lucky - one rainstorm, in the middle of Saturday night, which caused the campfire to stop a little earlier than expected but did little damage otherwise. The wind was more exciting, but didn't quite reach the gale forces which would have blown the marquees away. Stewards were deployed to patrol the

It is a truism of the horror genre that what you cannot see is far more frightening than what you can.

With this in mind, horror films about blindness are not a new idea. Julia's Eyes, however, is a lush, terrifying film that executes the concept perfectly. It's directed by newbie Guillem Morales, and produced by Spanish language cinema don Guillermo del Toro.

Julia (Belen Rudea) is a woman who is rapidly losing her sight to a congenital illness. The film opens with her discovering the apparent suicide of her twin sister, who has already gone blind. There is a marked difference in pace between the slowly creepy build of the first half and the relentlessly jumpy second half. Possibly the first hour could have done with a bit of tightening, but it does build up enough credibility and goodwill to get away with some of the sillier plot twists in the second.

I felt that, at a few points, the film favoured "boo" moments over explorations of relationships – most of the characters are given brief, intriguing introductions and their motives not fully explained. Sometimes this works brilliantly – not understanding people's motives layers with Julia's literal blindness the create a fug of paranoia around her – but once their underlying motive or secret had been revealed, it was not explained, which was annoying. Having said that, unusually for a horror film, the killer was beautifully painted, and their relationship with Julia made for a totally satisfying dénouement. Julia herself was a brilliant horror heroine – even when blind, she is never helpless, and keeps fighting to solve her own mystery rather than running away.

The film, especially towards the end, creates a perfect atmosphere of tension, with a handful of properly haunting
