

Is Extreme Parenting Effective for Essay Writing?

Wall Street Journal has published an article titled "Why Chinese mothers are better?" Amy Chua Professor at Ehl Law School thinks that severe love is the key to growing successful children. In her child care way, two daughters should not "spend the night, play games, not participate in school games, watch TV, do computer games." Pay for essays.

These measures may make most parents feel extreme. Several critics point out that this approach may arise from a simple belief that parents really can control their children.

Is the influence of parenting style very severe? Does strict management of your child's life lead to greater success, or will it be counterproductive?

"Extreme parenting is an effective technique", Anne Herbert tried to explain to Ami Tsai's memoirs and readers and book critics. Chua agreed to be a Chinese in particular and explained her child-rearing style with her memoirs, but also said, "Parents of all cultures can adopt it." Halbert says, "Children do not always want to do their best to determine the claims of people agreeing to the book, but parents want their children to work hard to achieve a high level of success We should declare it. " This is reasonable because parents discussing this point are more likely to want to control every aspect of their child's life, especially in academia.

There are two common parenting methods that obviously have a bad influence at the two extremes. It is stiff and confusing. Strict parenting involves too many rules, parental narrow expectations for children, and irrational punishment. Children growing under these conditions often become adults suffering from anxiety, obsessive compulsive disorder and perfectionism. They are often defensive and passive, seeking the acceptance and recognition of others. In contrast, chaotic parenting rarely provides rules, allowing children to do whatever they want without bounds or results, and help them discover their strength and ability I can not do. These children become adults with identity problems, interdependence, and poor borders. Their relationship tends to focus on what they think others want.
