School News

This week Class 3 have been learning how to develop written descriptions by using a “show not tell” technique. They focused on changing tense within their writing and used flashbacks as a tool for doing this.

I was delighted when Jude came to show me his work. He explained how he had developed his writing over the session and how he had been supported to do this.

Abbie and Jude would like to share their writing with you, please see attached.

Past

He was feeling trapped as in there, there is no way to escape. When he was watching, the Eagle glided past his window as the man retrieved the bird. He was so desperate to get closer, feeling like he had to achieve freedom as he stares blankly into the thin air. Like the world has just come to a stand still and it had stopped turning while everything froze. When he saw the Eagle he felt even more miserable because it was like he was in prison and the Eagle was free.

Present

While he is gliding off the cliff his heart is racing and all his thoughts flying through his head as he's rapidly speeding across all the lush green embedded down below. As he's looking over his shoulder, to see all the towering mountains, he feels free as a bird and like no one can stop him. Weaving through the spiky trees and the towering rocks.

By Abbie Wilson - Year 4

Trapped, every punch and shout made him worse, his freedom was being taken away - he was an animal in a cage. He curled up shaking, begging for it to stop. Behind the cold, deserted, brown shed the boy met it with force again and again, he shielded his head from both attacks. All of a sudden, for a few moments everything went black: a cold void sucking him in, a black fist grabbing his air. Finally everything went white, a deafening horde of nothing but yet everything, then it stopped. After, pain was everything now it was a sad, haunting memory.

He remembered doing his homework and seeing an eagle true and free, the boy stopped doing his homework and sprinted to a roof where the man (who owned the bird) stood. The boy hid from the man and gazed in wonder at the bird that was now circling the roof, when suddenly the man spotted the boy. Eyes full with fear and gasping for air the boy looked at the man and for some reason receives a smile and a beckoning over to meet the bird.

He set off on his extraordinary ascent - up the snow capped, grey mountain - to find freedom, the mountains stood gazing at his determination. Not even his many belongings could hold him down. The task of a leap of faith drew nearer and he remembered why he needed this. With a deep breath he took a jump and the sight of a bird became his vision.....

As he plummets like a stone being dropped, his breath leaves him - he just smiles and goes faster past the snow capped mountains, past the lush green hills, blanketed with fir trees and oaks. As the ground nears, he pulls a handle and his parachute erupts from a backpack and the ground rushes to meet him. Breathless he grins, his breath flowing back to him and happiness bubbling over.
