Explain how students are applying the artistic behavior(s) ☒: As part of this unit of study, students will engage in the artistic behaviors of idea development and making creative connections by exploring the big idea of community. Through research, answering essential questions, and participating in class reflections, they will identify the unique qualities that define their local community. Students will then translate their insights into visual representations by creating original marionettes, sets, and props for a collaborative marionette production. Additionally, they will design and paint a community art mural that represents their collective understanding and appreciation of their community.

Essential Question(s) ☒:

- What is community?
- What makes my community unique?
- What is my role within the community?
- Why is it important to know more about the people, places, and things in my community?

Unit Rationale ☒:

Community defines a sense of place and feelings of connection. In a community, we communicate with others and share our experiences. The introduction of community-based art education in the transformative art curriculum serves as a means to promote good citizenship, make meaningful contributions, develop a positive sense of community, mold values, and identify our personal role within the community. Working together with members of our community, we can problem-solve, learn from past traditions, and shape the future (T. Anderson & Milbrandt, 2005; Congdon, Blandy, & Bolin, 2001; Sickler-Voigt, 2026). Students will investigate the big idea community by studying local and internationally acclaimed artists. They will participate in art production activities, class discussions, and research as they work under the supervision of art and classroom teachers to meet each lesson's objectives.
