

Anti-Bullying Speech

If I had a million pounds to eradicate bullying, I would use it to develop a self-confidence-boosting app. When we hear of terrible, unfortunate kids who commit themselves as a result of bullying, we frequently become angry and turn to the bullies right away. That is not an issue, but sometimes, we ought to focus on the victim. Suicidal thoughts do not necessarily manifest as depressed people who have scars all over their bodies. This is why when children kill themselves due to bullying, the first reaction is usually shock, because nobody knew how badly their child was hurting, and how horrible they thought about themselves. Bullying remarks do not physically harm you, but they keep eating away at your thoughts, which is not always clear to the eye.

"It is the confidence in our bodies, minds, and spirits that permits us to keep exploring for new adventures," Oprah Winfrey once said in a statement. As I've already stated, the victim feels unworthy because they have low self-esteem and confidence, which causes them to start believing the bully's words because they feel unworthy of genuine gratitude. The bully's words and crude statements will not have any impact on the victims if they feel confident in themselves, which will eventually lead to the bully giving up.

I would use my money to develop an app that continually provides the user with inspiring quotations and sayings and even suggest books that can boost self-confidence. I want my app to be inclusive of bullies as well as everyone else. Tim Fargo, an American author, once stated, "Arrogance is the mask of insecurity." Bullies turn to making other people feel horrible about themselves because they are insecure themselves, which is why they do it. The actual challenge, according to renowned poet Maya Angelou, is to change the way you view yourself. We need everyone, including bullies, to feel loved and valued so they will make positive decisions rather than hurtful ones. This goes for both bullies and victims of bullying.

No amount of money can effectively address the complex issue of bullying, but I do believe that with the right tools, we can help those who are bullied and those who feel they must bully others to feel better about themselves. After all, as former First Lady Michelle Obama once said, "Your success will be determined by your own confidence and fortitude." Thank you.
