Important points

- This course offers a carefully structured programme of study in History which introduces students to a stimulating and specialised range of topics and sources and to a variety of critical and theoretical approaches.
- The programme is designed to recruit graduates who have a degree in History or whose degree contains at least 50% of History topics. The minimum classification for the degree should normally be a second class first division. However, students with an Honours Degree (e.g. in a related subject) who can demonstrate potential for post-graduate study in History will also be considered for the programme.
- Students will complete three twelve-week modules, two six-week modules and a final dissertation (15,000 words) on a topic of their choice.
- Students on the taught modules meet weekly for intensive seminars, and on the dissertation are supported in a programme of one-to-one supervision.
- Full-time students study over a period of one year, part-time students over two years.
- As well as breadth and depth of knowledge, students will develop advanced analytical, communication and research skills which may be transferred to a range of graduate careers.
- Wide reading is key to postgraduate study of History. Each module has required texts and sources, but students are expected to read beyond the required texts. Most texts are available via the university library and online resources and many can be purchased second-hand, therefore the costs below are merely indicative.
