the 1990s, the number of people aged 65 and over has increased in all countries, and the increase is expected to continue in the future (United Nations 2002).

As a result of the increase in the number of elderly people, the number of people aged 65 and over who are dependent on others has also increased. In 1990, 15.5% of the population aged 65 and over were dependent on others, but this figure is expected to increase to 20.5% by 2020 (United Nations 2002). This increase in the number of dependent elderly people has led to a growing concern about the availability of care for them.

There are two main ways of providing care for dependent elderly people: in the home or in residential care facilities. In the home, care is provided by family members or other people living in the same household. In residential care facilities, care is provided by staff who are trained to provide care for dependent elderly people. Residential care facilities are usually expensive, and many people are unable to afford them. In addition, residential care facilities are often criticized for being impersonal and for providing a poor quality of care (Kane 1996).

Home care is generally considered to be a more desirable option than residential care. It allows elderly people to remain in their own homes, which is often their preferred environment. Home care also allows elderly people to receive care from family members, which is often more comforting and supportive than care from strangers. However, home care can be expensive, and many people are unable to afford it. In addition, home care can be stressful for family members, and it may not be available in all areas.

Home care services are provided by a variety of organizations, including government agencies, non-profit organizations, and private companies. Home care services can include a range of activities, such as help with personal care, medication management, meal preparation, and transportation. Home care services can also include respite care, which allows family members to take a break from caring for their elderly loved one.

Home care services are often provided on a part-time basis, and the amount of care provided can be tailored to the needs of the elderly person. Home care services can be a valuable option for elderly people who are unable to care for themselves, and they can help to reduce the burden on family members. However, home care services can be expensive, and many people are unable to afford them. In addition, home care services may not be available in all areas.

Residential care facilities are usually expensive, and many people are unable to afford them. In addition, residential care facilities are often criticized for being impersonal and for providing a poor quality of care (Kane 1996). Residential care facilities are usually staffed with trained staff who provide care for dependent elderly people. Residential care facilities can provide a range of services, including help with personal care, medication management, meal preparation, and transportation. Residential care facilities can also provide social activities and other services that help to improve the quality of life for elderly people.

Residential care facilities are often a last resort for elderly people who are unable to care for themselves. Residential care facilities can be a valuable option for elderly people who need round-the-clock care, and they can provide a safe and secure environment for elderly people.
