

Cetacean Habitats

Many species have clear habitat preferences, determined by their feeding strategies. For example, sperm whales dive to great depths to catch squid, while other species feed on fish and crustaceans in shallow, coastal waters. Other species target large schools of fish or crustaceans on the continental shelf. However, some cetaceans, like bottlenose dolphins and killer whales, can be found in almost any marine environment.